Excerpt from Leonard Berberi's article for the "Corriere della Sera"

One evening in 2018, at his home just outside London, Jose Alejandro Zamora Yrala, a Venezuelan former DJ, typed on his phone: "When you edit a PDF, can you hide the fact that it's been edited?" He had been running AOG Technics Ltd, a company that sells aircraft spare parts, for three years, but business wasn't taking off. Shortly before that question, he had received 140 airworthiness certificates: crucial documents that certify the origin, maintenance, and safety of every aircraft component.

In the following months, dozens of AOG "employees" appeared on LinkedIn. The company website advertised itself as a "leading global supplier," with US FAA approvals and warehouses in the UK, Germany, the US, and Asia. The company's accounts exploded: from modest profits in 2019 (€25,140), they rose to €2.5 million in the twelve months ending in February 2020 and €2.7 million in February 2023.

Then, one evening in December 2023, British police showed up at Zamora Yrala's home, [...] arrested the former DJ, and seized his computer and phone. Within days, it was discovered that the employees didn't exist: their profile photos had been downloaded from stock image sites.

The only people actually hired were him, his then-wife, his then-brother-in-law, and the nanny. And those documents, so crucial to the safety of spare parts, were all redacted: first by Zamora Yrala himself, using existing PDF files, and then with the help of a graphic designer who created new ones.

The castle began to crumble in the spring of 2023. TAP Air Portugal technicians installed a supposedly new component on an A320, but it showed signs of wear. Suspicious, they rejected the replacement proposed by AOG and notified Safran, which produces CFMs together with General Electric. Inspections revealed that the certificates were forged and that some signatures belonged to non-existent individuals.

La notizia diventa pubblica attraverso Bloomberg e scattano le ispezioni su scala globale. Risultano coinvolti circa 200 motori nel mondo, meno dell'1% dei Cfm-56 in servizio, ma sufficienti a preoccupare l'industria.

Parti non idonee finiscono anche a Ethiopian Airlines, Delta, easyJet, Ryanair e Jet2. Lunedì scorso l'uomo è stato condannato a 4 anni e 8 mesi per frode commerciale. Ma la vicenda apre interrogativi anche sugli acquirenti. Secondo Addison Schonland, esperto di AirInsight, molte organizzazioni di manutenzione «avrebbero dovuto effettuare controlli più rigorosi sui fornitori, consultando database e verificando le autorizzazioni» prima di privilegiare offerte più economiche.

cupare l'industria.

L'uomo è riuscito a piazzare di tutto — pale di turbina, rondelle e guarnizioni —, secondo l'accusa. Tra il 2019 e il 2023 Zamora Yrala ha venduto circa 60 mila componenti per i motori Cfm-56 — i più diffusi, montati su Airbus A320 e Boeing 737 — incassando quasi 7 milioni di sterline. I pezzi, accompagnati da documentazione falsa, sono finiti a una cinquantina di clienti in un mercato in tensione, anche per la carenza di ricambi dopo il Covid. Il Serious Fraud Office stima danni per oltre 39 milioni di sterline. La sola American Airlines ha speso 23 milioni per gli interventi su 28 motori.
